Emmanouil Choustoulakis was born in Athens, Greece in 1980. He holds a bachelor's degree in Economics (with specialization in Industrial Economics), and also a Master's degree in Educational Technology and Digital Systems (with specialization in E-learning), both from the University of Piraeus, Greece. In his Master's thesis, he investigated critical factors affecting the adoption and diffusion of Information and Communication Technologies in modern Greek SME's. Currently, he is a PhD Candidate in the field of Economics of Education in the Informatics and Mathematics Department of National and Kapodistrian University of Athens.

Research Interests

His research interests focus on the interactions between the disciplines of Informatics, Economic Science, and Education. He is particularly interested in examining the economic contribution and effectiveness of modern ICT on various educational contexts. He has participated in several short and long term research projects, utilizing advanced statistical models, and acquiring expertise in research methodology. His vita lists publications in international scientific journals, and conference proceedings.
